In the great 1974 film Godfather II.

There's a scene about halfway through where Hyman Roth and Michael Corleone and all the American gangsters are gathered in a patio in Havana and it's Hyman Roth's 67th birthday,

[00:00:18: GRAPHIC: STILL: CUTTING CAKE] and he's giving a slice of cake to each gangster got - Louis from Chicago you run the Copacabana, Frankie you get the prostitutes, he's dividing up the island among all the American gangsters

[00:00:26 McChesney 100%] and appropriately enough the birthday cake has an outline of Cuba on it, he's giving them a slice of Cuba. And while Hyman Roth is doing this he says: "Isn't it great to be in a country with a government that respects private enterprise?" And that's how media policies have been done in the United States for the past 50 years and it's increasing in the last 20 years. Extraordinarily powerful lobbyists duke it out behind closed doors for the biggest slice of the cake. The public knows nothing about it, it doesn't participate.

Media is the nervous system of a democracy. If it's not functioning well, the democracy can't function. We're heading towards an election where most people are never going to be in a room with Kerry or Bush. What they learn about the candidates is what the media shows them or tells them. At Fox, they didn't care. The fact that the, you know, the senior political reporter, his wife, is actually campaigning for the Bush Campaign at a time when this guy is covering them, that didn't even register. First person who made the call to say that George W. That person was a gentleman named John Ellis and he is George W. Bush's first cousin.

[WIPE TO:] 00:53:29 JOHN NICHOLS 100%

At around 2 in the morning, on election night, the, a new set of data had come in and it was complex data from precincts all over Florida. [WIPE TO:] The proper answer in analyzing that data unquestioningly was: you couldn't tell, it was too close to call, there was simply no clear winner. Instead, John Ellis called it as a clear win for George Bush. Fox News then interrupted its ongoing election coverage and announced that George Bush had been elected President of the
